What is known is that only half of those experiencing mental health problems sought help from the NHS, and those that did were rarely referred to specialist mental health services. Veterans' mental health problems may be made worse or caused by post-service factors, such as the difficulty in making the transition to civilian life, marital problems, and loss of family and social support networks.

The framing of health policy as a war has skewed the distribution of resources, and opened a vast chasm between the mental and the physical. In turn, this dearth of research has “created a lack of understanding in both policy and in some scientific circles, and that lack of understanding has reinforced a lack of political will.”
