Strategy promises to turn the use of force into an instrument of policy.
This book explores how military operations undertaken by European armed forces are intended to deliver political effects. Drawing on the work of Carl von Clausewitz it argues that strategy is the product of an iterative politico-military dialogue.

Alexander's thesis argues, firstly, that the operations planning cycle from political initiation to military plan constitutes the critical interface in the making of strategy for these endeavours. Operations planning is conceptualised as an iterative yet unequal politico-military dialogue that enables the formulation of a rational intent behind military operations.
