A patient in pain can think about very little else, and may become very demanding. A failure to address their pain is likely to make a patient become very difficult. It is very important to make arrangements to see anyone who is in pain as quickly as possible. Try and do the least invasive or least irreversible treatment possible to resolve the pain.

Understanding the source of their frustration may help you find a solution. Maintain eye contact, but not prolonged. Keep an adequate distance from the patient, but keep away from corners. It is helpful if the furniture in your room is arranged in such a way that you can easily leave, but the patient doesn't feel trapped.

Dealing with challenging patients - The MDU

In some exceptionally difficult circumstances – such as the journey of a patient with cancer or someone close to death – people may feel pressured to start to talk about meaningful subjects and intimate thoughts and feelings. For those who have avoided open communication so far, this is confronting and enormously challenging.

Communication Skills in Healthcare: A Guide to Practice

Difficult patients who are going through trying situations might be reacting to their circumstances. More often than not, it is not a patient's intention to attack you personally. So, when dealing with these situations, provide empathy so they feel understood.
