Communication skills are essential in every profession, but the health professions boast the greatest complexity and variety of audiences. The well-being of human lives depends on clear and accurate messages, whether the audience is a patient, colleague, staff member, or caregiver. To better prepare you for the challenge of successful professional communication, Writing in the Health Professions targets the three main audiences of the health provider: other professionals, patients and ...

Background: Studies have found that students in the medical professions often lack the writing skills required during their education and career. One contributing factor to this deficiency is that writing tends to be discipline specific, rather than requiring general skills acquired in undergraduate schools. Purpose: To determine the extent to which a rigorous writing exercise impacted the quality of students' medical writing based on a specified rubric.
